Summary : Free stereotype threat in persistent women pdf download - this research investigated whether women who persist in mathematics-related fields were susceptible to the negative effects described in stereotype threat theory the effects of two situational cues test diagnosticity test diagnostic versus non-diagnostic and stereotype relevance no mention of gender men perform better and men and women perform equally were examined three competing models were tested a predominant cue model an additive cue model and an interactive cue model additionally the impact of women s problem self-efficacy on the relation of these two situational cues to performance and self-processes was explored one-hundred and seventy-eight women majoring in mathematics-related fields were randomly assigned to one of six conditions created by crossing levels of test diagnosticity and stereotype relevance participants read and listened to one of the six directions created for this study afterwards they worked on calculus problems and filled out a post-test questionnaire the results showed that women in mathematics-related fields were not inoculated against negative stereotype threat effects and the predominant cue model was supported compared to women in which no mention of gender was made women explicitly reminded of men s superior math abilities answered fewer problems answered fewer correctly and reported fewer guesses furthermore these findings were qualified by problem self-efficacy high self-efficacy women tended to be negatively affected when both cues were present stereotypes were made relevant to the task and it was diagnostic of individual ability thus for high self-efficacious women explicitly priming gender is necessary but not sufficient to lead to negative stereotype threat effects in contrast low self-efficacy women tended to perform poorly when either cue was present only when no mention of gender was made and problems were non-diagnostic of ability did performance increase for low self-efficacious women explicitly priming gender is both necessary and sufficient to lead to negative stereotype threat effects results suggest it is important to consider both situational cues and individual characteristics in understanding the effects of stereotype threat situations
